HON. STEPHENSON KING,
Minister of Finance.
Honda and Nissan Consider Plug-in Hybrids

Honda and Nissan have been banking on fuel cells and electric cars as the long-term strategy for sustainable mobility. Company executives are now warming up to plug-in hybrids.

Since their introduction in the US in late 1999, hybrid cars have been repeatedly dismissed as a “bridge technology” — a euphemism for a short-lived second-rate technology that briefly serves a purpose until it can be replaced with something better and longer lasting. But in recent statements coming within days of one another, executives from Honda and Nissan are reconsidering the role that hybrids will play in the coming decades.

For both companies, the plug-in hybrid is seen as the next stage of hybrids and as the key to the technology’s longevity. Honda was banking on a transition to fuel cell cars, while Nissan was primarily moving toward the pure battery-electric vehicle.

Honda began leasing a limited number of its FCX Clarity hydrogen fuel cell cars last year, and still sees hydrogen as the long-term alternative to gasoline. But Honda President Takeo Fukui believes that the cost of fuel will need to increase before hydrogen-powered cars are ready for significant growth. In an interview published by Bloomberg, he said, “Oil prices are going to go up. When that time comes, fuel cells, solar panels, hydrogen, those will be the key words. We will have packages that will be very competitive at that time.” In the meantime, he said the company is “thinking about plug-in hybrids.” He added, “We aren’t thinking about commercializing one right away.” Honda will need to modify its current mild hybrid system—or develop a new approach—in order to produce plug-in hybrids.

Honda began leasing a limited number of its FCX Clarity hydrogen fuel cell cars last year, and still sees hydrogen as the long-term alternative to gasoline. However, for the first time, Honda executives are now speaking of hybrids and plug-in hybrids as a mainstream technology with staying power. Nissan is also beginning to consider plug-in hybrids.

The Bridge Gets Much LongerHonda’s views on plug-in hybrids are also motivated by new consumer tax credits — as much as $7,500 for a robust plug-in hybrid. Fukui said, “We understand the situation, in terms of government and incentives. Naturally, we’re going to have to accommodate that too.”

Nissan also sees a future jump in oil prices as the key to its long-term efficient technology: the electric car. “When GDP growth comes back on a worldwide basis, there will be again attention on the oil market, which will trigger an oil price increase,” said Carlos Tavares, Nissan executive vice president. “We will be in the right tempo to face that environment.”

Mark Perry, Nissan product planner, told HybridCars.com, “Zero emission vehicles are clearly our focus and we believe it’s the future state of transportation. Some segments of the market in the near term may best be served by high efficiency internal combustion engines, diesels, hybrids or extended range electric vehicles [also known as plug-in hybrids].” He added that these technologies are “all bridge technologies to the time when battery electric vehicles and fuel cell vehicles can cover every market segment.”

The Key Question: When?The key question for both companies is how long it will take until electric cars and fuel cell vehicles can reach levels approaching the current hybrid market. After 10 years on the market, hybrids represent less than 3 percent of the new car market.

Speaking at the Society of Automotive Engineers’ 2009 World Congress last week, Minoru Shinohara, Nissan corporate senior vice president, said that plug-in hybrids will be an important transition solution to the pure electric vehicle because they don’t need an extensive public charging infrastructure. The cost of building the public charging infrastructure will cost many billions of dollars; therefore, most analysts believe that it could take decades to construct.

Hybrids will not necessarily disappear even after an electric-recharging or hydrogen-refueling infrastructure is built. Kenji Nakano, senior chief engineer, Honda R&D, also appearing at the World Congress, said, “Hybrid technology is also applied to fuel cell vehicles, range-extender vehicles, and plug-in hybrid vehicles. Thus, instead of being a bridge technology, hybrids are expected to remain in the mainstream for quite some time.”
Bravo playing for the wrong Indians

It is baffling that Dwayne Bravo is fit enough for IPL matches but not for the Tests in England

Dwayne Bravo is a curious case. To the medically ignorant, or just plain cynical, the reason given by the West Indies Cricket Board for the omission of so vital a player from the team for the two forthcoming Tests in England is illogical. It simply doesn’t ring true.

“The WICB’s medical panel has advised that Dwayne Bravo is unavailable for the Test series as he is still recovering after ankle surgery,” was the terse postscript to the announcement of the squad of 17.

But had Bravo not returned to the West Indies team on March 15, six months after his operation, to play in the Twenty20 and all five ODIs in the home series against England?

Certainly there was not the slightest indication on the field that he was “still recovering”. He bowled his 38.3 overs and celebrated his nine wickets as energetically as ever (‘you have to run and try and catch him when he gets a wicket’, Chris Gayle noted), stroked ten fours and two sixes in his five innings and cavorted around the field like soca singer Machel Montano on stage, not someone worrying about whether his ankle could cope with all his energy.

His first act when he took the field as substitute in the final Test on March 6 was a swooping, underarm, direct-hit run-out of Owais Shah. No sign of a recovering ankle there.

It is more baffling that, while Bravo won’t be in the Tests at Lord’s and Chester-le-Street, seeking to keep the Wisden Trophy regained by West Indies in the Caribbean last month, he will be in South Africa, committing his immense all-round talents to the Mumbai, not the West, Indians in the IPL.

The presumption must be that the WICB doctors deemed that a left ankle operated on six months ago is more likely to buckle under the stress of a five-day Test than the 20-overs-an-innings bash that is the IPL.

If so, it was refuted by Andrew Flintoff’s experience in the IPL last week when he twisted his knee on the outfield of Kingsmead in Durban in the service of the Chennai Super Kings, eliminating England’s premier allrounder from the Tests against West Indies.

Whatever the format, there is always the danger of injury, especially in the case of wholehearted cricketers happy to be back on the field after layoffs from injury.

Bravo had told Cricinfo that his exclusion was “forced on me”, explaining that the WICB medics had advised him to get stronger before he can play five-day cricket. “I am excluded because of my situation with the injury,” he said, adding that “everyone knows that Test cricket is the most important”.

The background simply adds to the confusion.

In a lengthy interview with Michelle McDonald on the caribbeancricket.com website, Bravo said the problems with his ankle go back as far as 2005 when he twisted it in an ODI against Pakistan in St Lucia.

With the international schedule as crowded as it is, he pointed out that he never had time to give it a proper rest. He played on with the aid of pain-killing injections but always knew surgery was inevitable.

The question was not whether but when. Eventually, the pain became unbearable and he had to make what he called the “big decision” following last year’s home series against Australia. The choice was between hanging on for the Stanford 20/20 for US$20 million match on November 1 with the prospect, but by no means certainty at the time, of a million-dollar pay day and an immediate operation he hoped would get him ready for the home series against England. He opted for the latter. “When I put everything together, my health is more important than a one-off 20/20 game and my aim was to try and get back for the England series,” he told McDonald. “That was the most important thing for me.”

As it turned out, the recovery took longer than Bravo had hoped for, keeping him out of the five Tests against England.

In the interim, another unfortunate factor entered the equation. Bravo claimed in his caribbeancricket.com interview that, while the WICB “looked after me in terms of putting things in place for my surgery to be done”, he had received nothing in insurance from the WICB during the eight months he was sidelined.

He called it “upsetting” and said that he was not the only player affected. Fidel Edwards and Sewnarine Chattergoon are known to be others.

The issue is one of the many areas of disagreement between the WICB and the West Indies Players’ Association (WIPA).

The WICB contended that it needs details of any injury from either the player or the WIPA, on his behalf, to present to its insurers. The WIPA countered that it is the WICB’s responsibility. The matter has been reportedly sorted out and the relevant players, Bravo included, can now make their claims and be paid.

Yet it might just explain why the WICB is at pains to be seen as so overcautious in protecting Bravo from aggravation of an injury that has already caused aggravation of another kind between it and the player and the WIPA.
